Annotation: This article analyzes the innovative and very interesting methods that we have in teaching the English language. We can have a range of teaching methods between traditional and modern. Everyone has their understanding and conclusions about teaching the English language. But this paper shows the combination of these two ways how we can make our teaching very effective. We have been completely confined to traditional methods of teaching and understanding that today's learners are a little uncomfortable with. The mind of the learner will never be static, it is always growing and changing.

Key Words: Renaissance; orthodox; integral; inquisitive; agitated; jeopardizing; immerse; atmosphere; intuitively; evaluated; database; anagrams; hangman; elocutions; tedious; precautions.

English, the official language of the whole world, is a very difficult language to teach. Every language is taught differently. English is a very ancient language and has undergone many forms of change, from Proto-English, which originated in Latin and German cultures, to Modern English, which emerged in the post-Renaissance era. Each version was easier than the previous one. Today's English is the easiest adaptation of a very ancient language, and yet it is still difficult to teach this language effectively, especially for those who speak English as a second language. In today's world, English is taught in a very orthodox way. Basic training is required. Teaching the alphabet and word formation is essential and a must. But there is something that is even more important. Children must be able to pronounce the words and understand their meaning before writing them down. The basis for teaching English can only be taught using the orthodox methods of teaching the alphabet, words, and rules. But then most students. While there is no other way to teach the basics of the language other than the traditional way, these methods need a little tweaking to appeal to students. When it comes to teaching English to high school students who have already mastered the basics, traditional methods tend to give poorer results than innovative methods. This has already been proved by implementing methods like using stories, poems, movies, books, newspapers, etc. These methods help students learn the language better without them even realizing it, and they also keep their interest up. This article introduces some of these methods of teaching English.

Enacting the stories. Stories are a very important part of language teaching. These stories help teach students how to form sentences and how express their thoughts and many other things, and they also help keep students interested because the end of the stories is something every student wants to know. It arouses the students' curiosity. Any unfinished story always keeps the reader's mind agitated. Although this method of using stories has been implemented, the practice of teaching the language with it is generally wrong. The assessment process to test students' language skills is through story-based questions. This is generally not that effective. Because of this, students generally tend to pick up the stories as chapters rather than viewing them as interesting reading. A story should appeal to the creative part of the brain. It helps us be more imaginative by trying to visualize the things that happen in the story. It should not only teach them the language but also help them learn a lesson from history. Leaving assessment questions destroys the whole idea of imagination as students view the story as something they must learn to get answers.

There is a better way to use the stories with stories in English. Students can act out the stories or plays. In this way, the students deal with the stories personally. You can bring your interpretation of the character to life. It is interesting for the students to understand the characters and to empathize with their positions. It stimulates their creativity by allowing them to create the entire set, assign the characters and play it the way they imagined. It also helps them understand others' interpretation of the story and helps them have healthy conversations about it, which in turn helps them learn the language. It removes the boring aspects and makes learning more colorful without sacrificing language learning. It may not be perfect, but it will impress you deeply. The story will help them learn the language as they represent it through dialogue that they extract from the stories themselves, and modifications can also be made to the pieces to help students be more interactive and creative. You can add more lines and characters, change the ending, add an interesting twist, etc. The more creative the change, the more points the team gets.

This also leads to personality development and helps them to work as team players all the time while they student is learning the language. For example, if Julius Caesar were taught using traditional question-and-answer methods, the student would never understand the deep emotions of Brutus, the cunning of Cassius, the loyalty of Antony, the tragedy of war, the brilliance of Antony's speech, and more understand many other aspects of history for which the story of Julius Caesar was written by Shakespeare. The same goes for all the great stories like Christmas carols, Harry Potter, and epic stories. Emotions help define the story and are a very important aspect of language and personality. If these emotions are left out, it would be very difficult to express ourselves. On the other hand, when such stories are staged, every intention of the story becomes clear. Students must immerse themselves in the atmosphere of the story and put themselves in their shoes. This whole process has many benefits, apart from being a very effective way of teaching the language; It helps preserve the literature that is none other than our culture. This method leads to the overall learning experience that the story aims to convey and in the end, the student will be able to answer questions without preparing for it as an exam, moreover, the whole process is fun and not boring at all. Therefore, it ensures that the learning process is complete.

. The conversation is by far the most useful way to teach the language. When a child learns his mother tongue, he does so through the conversations that take place between him and others or by listening to the conversations of others. The child is never taught the language but is still able to perceive the meaning and learns it automatically to use it in daily life. Nobody ever teaches the child the characters of the language, how to form sentences or the grammar of that language. Only the conversations teach the children. Therefore, conversations are a very important part of the teaching process. Sentence structure and grammar cannot be completely conveyed by rules. They have to be conveyed intuitively. This is only possible through a lot of reading and a lot of listening. This is easy as every conversation needs a topic. The topic can be given to the students in the form of written material which they must first read, then form an opinion, and then talk about, or it can be spoken out and then they can listen, understand, and also join in the discussion. Participation and other aspects of the conversation can always be evaluated through points, which also encourage students to engage in the conversation. These conversations must be general. They must be like friends talking to each other. In this way, the students can express themselves optimally. This process can take some time, but in the end, teaching the language would be the most efficient way.

Teaching through games. This is a very interesting teaching method. Students and children in general tend to like games and want to play them more and more. Traditional methods dictate a separation of study and play, but the fact remains that students are more interested in play than in sitting down and learning. Any logical reasoning would force us to combine the two aspects to solve the problem. The playful part of learning would help the students keep their interest as the desire to win is very strong. It keeps us going and if integrated into different aspects of learning, the learning process would last almost the whole day without the kids getting tired or bored from studying. Languages play a very important role in our lives. They help us express our emotions. They help us explain what we want. They help us to communicate and are therefore the most important tools to express who we are. Therefore, knowing and using a language properly is very important as it defines us. If there were no languages to help us communicate, there would be no difference in our communication and the way animals communicate.

Therefore, the way languages are taught plays a very important role in a person's life. Since English is the official language of this world, it is of utmost importance that this language is taught in a way that not only helps us to speak, write and listen, but also to communicate. That is the purpose of language and it must be used for that. Therefore, innovative methods help bring about change, mostly for the better. It helps students learn faster and in an efficient, interesting, and interactive way, and it is the responsibility of teachers to abandon traditional methods and make way for new and better methods for the benefit of students.
