English colonization in Canada began in the early 16th century, leading to intense rivalry between the French and English. The Treaty of Utrecht (1713) and the Conquest of Quebec (1760) solidified British control. The Loyalist migration and Confederation (1867) further entrenched English dominance. Despite recognizing bilingualism in the Durham Report (1839) and the Official Languages Act (1969), English remains the dominant language, influencing governance, education, and culture. This historical legacy contributes to Canada's unique bilingual and multicultural identity.

Canada proudly embraces linguistic diversity, with English standing prominently as one of its official languages.
